Where Some of the Best Wine of California is Made.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE APPEAL:—These names represent two of the finest vineyards and two of the leading wines of California.

The trip to these romantic spots where these wines are produced, is one continual round of pleasure and commenced, for the party of which your commentator was, happily for himself, a member, at the Mark T street pier in San Francisco, where the regular ferry was taken across to Oakland. Here a train waited to convey passengers over a portion of the regular overland route to a small station where the boat waited to carry them to Vallejo.

Very soon after leaving Oakland the country assumes a farmy aspect that is always so comforting to the mind and restful to the eye after the restless rush and roar of the City. Broad fields of meadow with horses and cattle quietly grazing, and further on fields of corn and then orchards and vineyards stretching along the line of the track for miles. A vineyard with its bright green hue and agreeable regularity is about as refreshing as the face of nature ever becomes and here there is no less than 25 miles of almost solid vine acreage. Had it not been for the presence of an expert in the party all would have thought those vineyards very nearly perfect, as it was, our minds were disabused of that comforting thought by being informed that they were in a very lamentable state owing to the pest called phylloxera, whose special province seemed to be to eradicate as many vines as possible and that as rapidly as is consistent with the vermin's well being.

The ride continued to St Helena where a carriage was in waiting to finish the trip. By this time the sun had set and already the hills, which are most beautifully wooded with oaks, pines and the native trees of California, were bathed in the rich warm purple and the rosy tints of evening. The road led straight for the mountains and wound along the hill side beneath a ceaseless avenue of trees. Then up a ravine rich with the luxuriance that nature so generously bestows. A clear, cold stream went gurgling and babbling along down over its rocky bed, through hedges of fern and overhanging boughs, from trees that grow along its banks in tropical prodigality. A young moon showed faintly through the branches whenever they parted sufficiently, and fireflies flashed their stars in the long grass while everywhere the crickets sang in comforting chirups.

Schramberger, so called from its genial host, David Schram, is charmingly situated on quite a prominence way back next to the hill where it is nearly lost to sight in the trees. A sharp turn in the road brought us nearly to the door and the next moment witnessed the most cordial welcoming and extending of hospitality that the big-hearted, generous old couple are capable of. The house is a large one and although it seemed nearly full of other guests its broad wings were opened and all found rest and shelter within its spacious apartments. The evening passed rapidly amid merry stories and much fine old wine, so that every person there carried to bed more or less of the wholesome grape juice.

In the morning a general inspection of the vineyards and cellars followed a late breakfast. The vines are all way up on the side hills where the sun warms the grapes into that warm, rich lusciousness that is so essential to the flavor and bouquet of wine. The vineyards embrace about 100 acres of vines and is being extended yearly. The cellars are deep, broad, high tunnels running into the hill and cut in the solid face of the mountain. Here the great tuns stand side by side ripening their precious burdens in the cool, damp caves. Subterranean channels and drifts connect these tunnels, which are four or five in number. They are about two hundred feet long and twenty or more wide. They are as closely occupied as is possible by tuns holding 400 and 1000 gallons. This vineyard manufactures from 40 to 45,000 gallons annually and at this time there is about 100,000 gallons standing ripening in the cellars, and which is worth at least $1 per gallon. Mr. Schram has been 30 years acquiring this property and now values it at $250,000. He began with no capital but his hands. The cellars are under the direct supervision of a genuine Baron, Eward Von Pessl. He is a highly educated gentleman, courteous and agreeable and treats his wines as if they were his children.

At noon mine host seated eighteen people at his board and treated them to as sumptuous a meal as this country affords. A chowder served there required two men to lift it on the table. Fine old wine and good cheer shared honors equally and both flowed in torrents.

Late in the afternoon a smaller party rode through the delightful country to the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Parrott. This home is simply superb, situated far back in the hills on a decided prominence and overlooking the most enchanting portion of Napa Valley. Here a merry symposium had gathered with the Lord and Lady of the manor, under the shade of the largest madrone tree known in miles around.

We were gratified to find Carson's old friend and faithful servant, George Tuffy, looking quite well, and evidently glad to see some Carson folk.

This is Villa Miravalle, whose wine bearing the same name will some day be famous, and a more beautiful home is not to be found in California. Mrs. Parrott, (nee Tuffy), is a bright and thoughtful as ever. She gave her guests complete possession of her splendid home, and did all in her power to make the brief visit pleasurable. It would be much easier to tell of a few things that do not grow there than to attempt a description or naming of the endless variety of plants and trees that do so much to enhance the grandeur of this tropical garden, and no exaggeration need ever be feared by those who listen to tales of its wonders. Three acres are occupied by roses alone, and Mrs. Parrott has 300 varieties.

The return trip through the dark sweet-scented ravine was a repetition of that of the previous evening, and the next morning at six we left this little paradise and came back to the din, roar and confusion of the city.
